Calm, with headquarters in Des Moines, has issued a draft to the city of Minneapolis, indicating a potential increase in the number of buses. The city of Minneapolis is currently reviewing the proposal, and a decision is expected by the end of the month. The new buses are expected to be delivered by the end of the year, and will be used to serve the growing needs of the city.

The draft includes plans for a new route that will serve the downtown area, as well as extensions to existing routes. The buses will be equipped with the latest technology, including GPS tracking and real-time passenger information. The draft also includes plans for a new bus depot, which will be located on the south side of the city.

The city of Minneapolis is currently considering options for financing the project, including a bond issue and a federal grant. The city has also reached out to local businesses and community organizations to participate in the project.

In other news, the city of Minneapolis has announced plans to upgrade its transit system, including the installation of new bus shelters and the addition of bike lanes along major routes. The upgrades are expected to be completed by the end of the year.
