Sudden Terror Strikes

Now that much of the first shock has worn off of the area's recent tornadoes, it behooves all of us to be thankful that the damages and the death toll didn't climb higher.

The damage figure was bad enough but the death toll is truly tragic. That's what makes it so hard to undergo a tornado. A hurricane can cause as much damage as a tornado—the death toll can be as high—but a hurricane doesn't come with the awful suddenness and cold-blooded terror that accompanies a tornado.

Since the advent of the "Hurricane Hunter" aircraft and the extensive use of radar, there is hardly any area that doesn't receive ample time to prepare for the onslaught of a hurricane. Not so with a tornado.

While the citizenry can be alerted to the fact that "tornado conditions exist," no one can truly forecast when a twister will hit. Some areas do sound alarms when such conditions exist but others feel that too many alarms—without a storm actually striking—would result in the old story of "Wolf! Wolf!"—that people would soon relax and not respond at all.

No criticism should be cast upon the Weather Bureau in this regard—they've been working on the problem for years. Perhaps, someone, someday, will come up with the solution.

In the meantime, during threatening weather the best advice is to keep an eye upon the sky, a prayer in the heart and an open cellar door.

Thoughts While Perambulating

Traffic is getting so heavy, the only way to get across the street is to be born there. . . There's a tree surgeon in the area who says business is so good he plans to branch out. . . These days you can't judge a woman by her clothes—there's insufficient evidence. . . Always look at the brighter side of things. If you have a cigaret lighter that won't work, it's better than having one that won't go out. . . Medical science says that whiskey can't cure the common cold. But when you come right down to it, neither can medical science. . . I don't understand women. They yell at seeing a mouse, then go riding with a wolf. . . I wouldn't be seen with a girl who would go out with a man as ugly as I am. . . My drinking uncle was an old Indian fighter. He never fought anybody but old Indians. . . It's not so bad being by yourself — except when you're alone. . . You don't see anybody in our office wasting time around the water fountain. No, sir! They're all out having coffee. . . There's a new toothbrush that contains food particles. It's for people who can't eat between brushings.
